

Once a month, a truck takes a picture of your house.

The City of Dallas runs AI enabled cameras on its sanitation brush trucks. Code Compliance says every residential property in the city is likely to be photographed once a month on bulk trash pickup days.

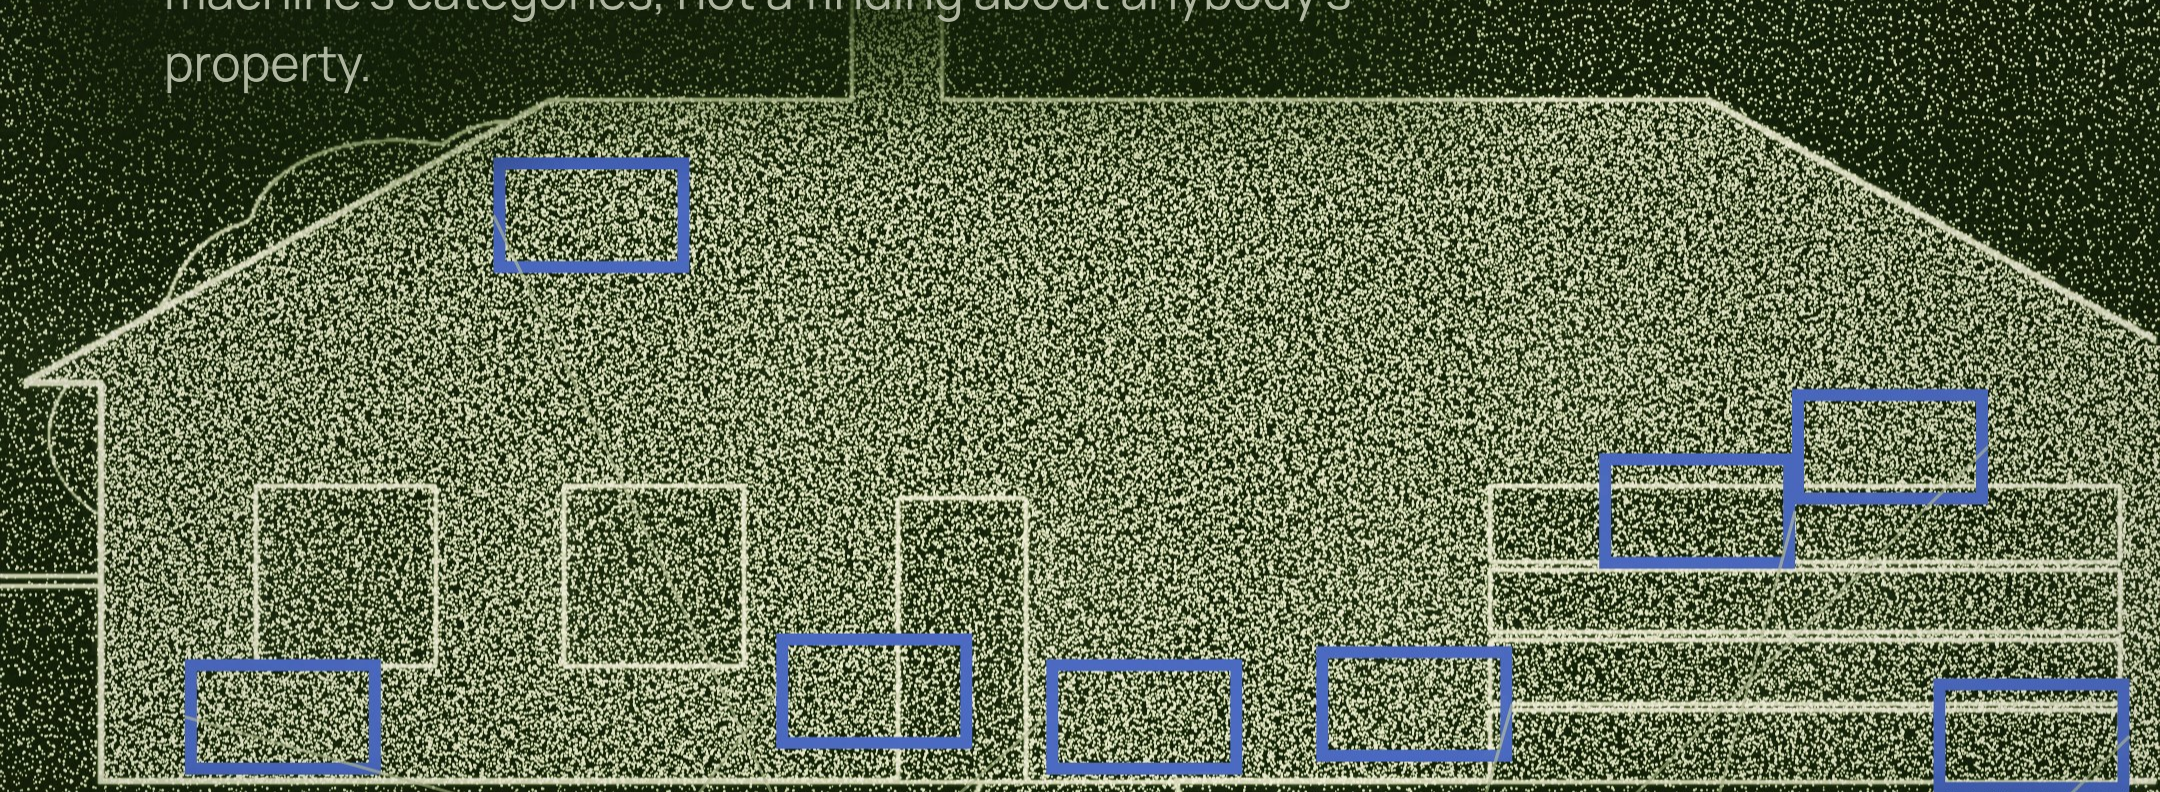

Two cameras. One truck. No zoom.

Two cameras mounted on one city vehicle, taking photographs as it drives at 25 to 35 MPH, at 1920p x 1080p, with a fixed focal length and automated blurring of personal information.

Eight things it is looking for.

The December briefing listed what the software detects. The house is in good repair and the eight are the machine's categories, not a finding about anybody's property.

bulk trash participation

collapsing structures

trash

tires

illegal dumping

graffiti

boarded windows/doors

high grass

What the city said it would not be.

A Finance Committee briefing on December 9th, 2025 set out the terms and gave one slide to two columns. The three refusals are the document’s own words in the document’s own order.

What it IS

Proactive property condition detection

Public right-of-way image capture

Just like Google Street View

What this IS NOT

NOT staff replacement

NOT automated ticketing

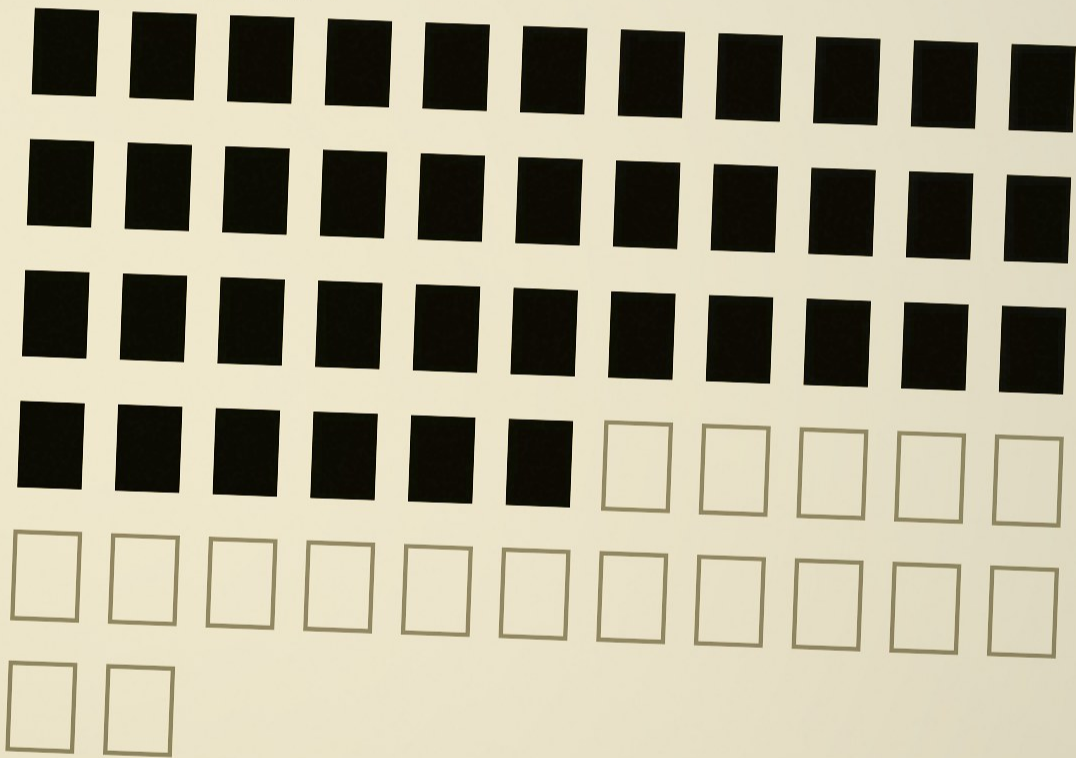

There is a human in the loop for all actions

NOT public safety surveillance

39 of the 57 landed in three districts.

Code Compliance says there are more code violations in Southern Dallas than in Northern Dallas and the goal is never citations. A council member says the program could end up being inadvertently a tax on the poor.

DISTRICTS 4, 8 AND 7

39 of those citations, or 68%, were issued to people in City Council Districts 4, 8 and 7 in Southern Dallas.

The letter, in its own words.

NBC 5 reported the city manager’s memo saying a courtesy notice is not a warning or a violation. This is what the notice says.

violations identified

courtesy notice and is not a citation or formal notice of violation

If the violations remain, the City may issue a Notice of Violation, issue a citation, or refer the property for abatement...

Please correct the violations promptly to avoid further enforcement action.

NBC 5 reported the memo saying a courtesy notice is not a warning or a violation.

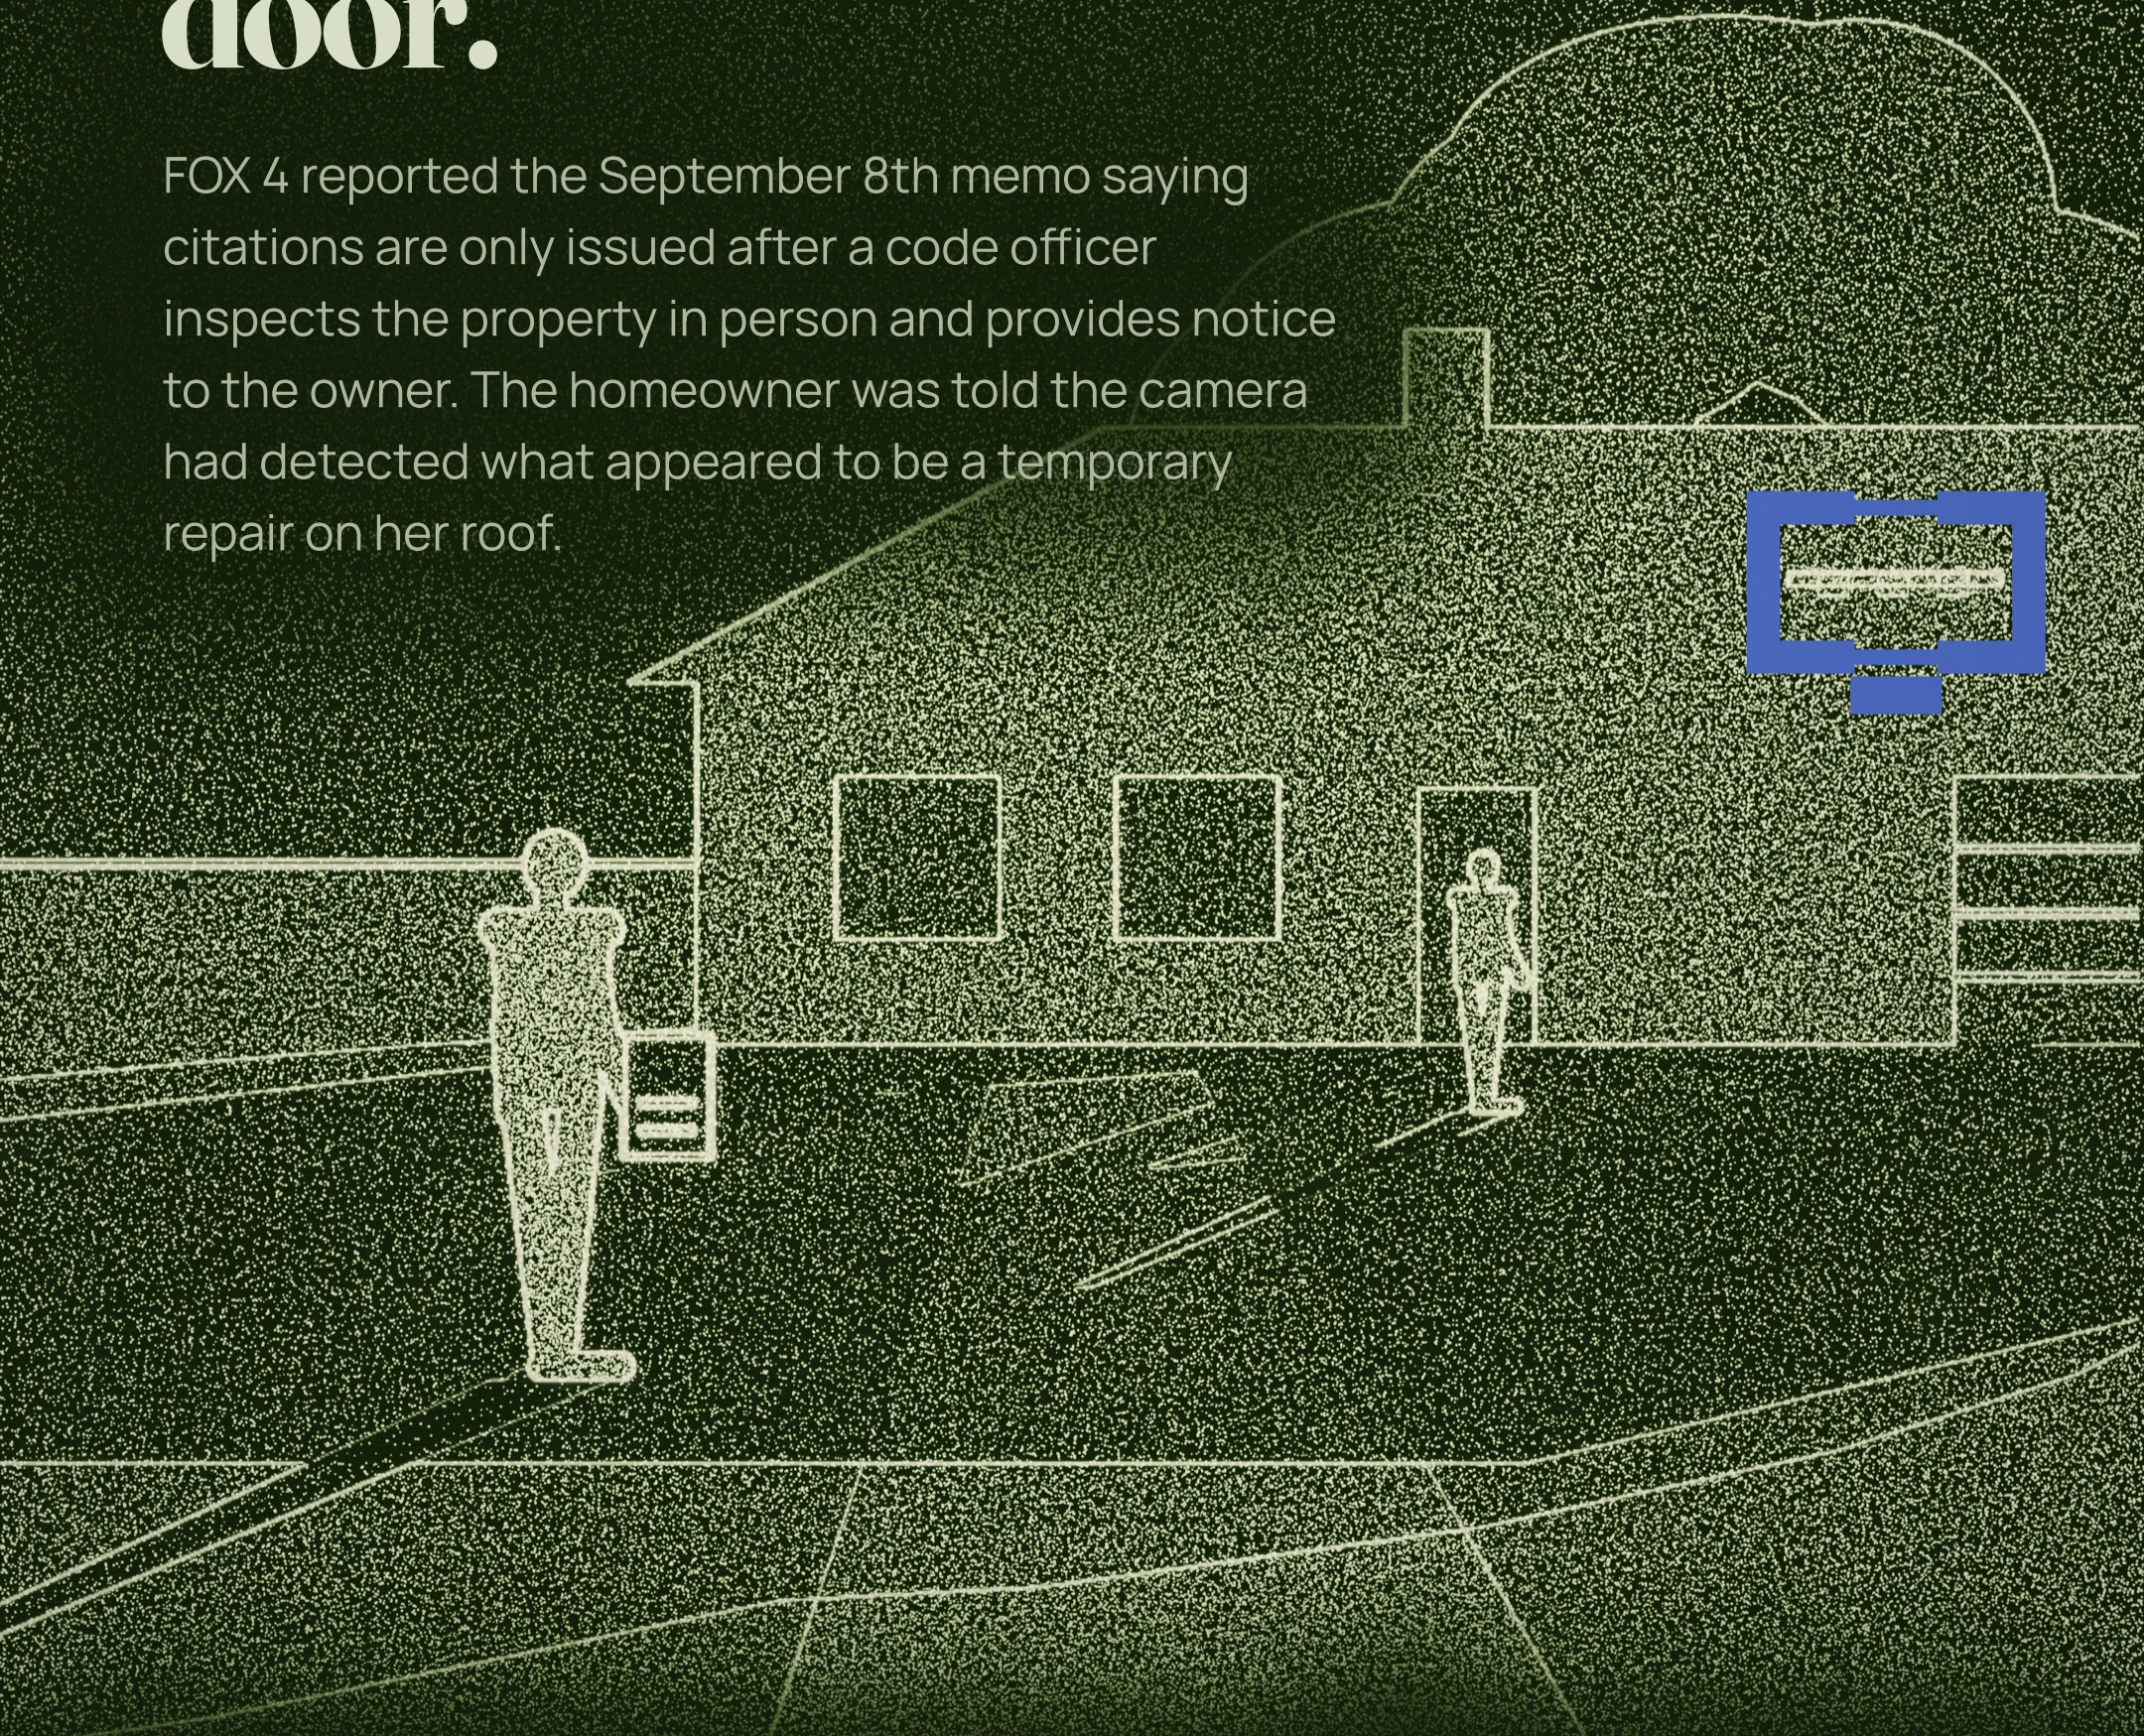

"I would say you could call that a warning."

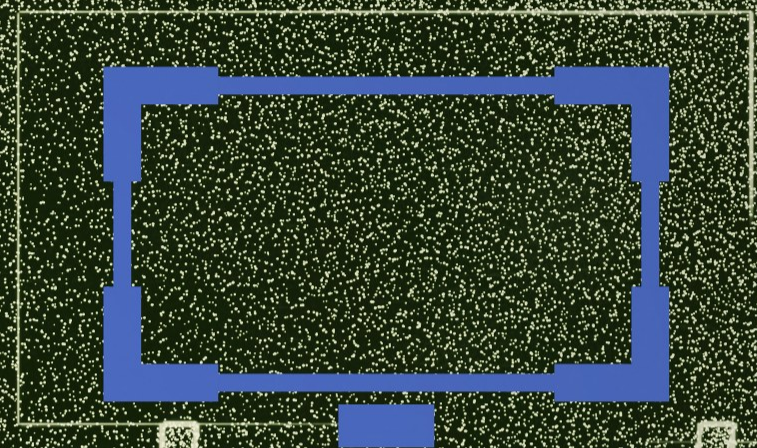

Code Compliance says the notices do not require anything of the property owners.

NBC 5 put it to Jeremy Reed, Assistant Director of Dallas Code Compliance, that a notice asking an owner to act to avoid enforcement is a warning. That was his answer.

A citation still needs somebody at the door.

FOX 4 reported the September 8th memo saying citations are only issued after a code officer inspects the property in person and provides notice to the owner. The homeowner was told the camera had detected what appeared to be a temporary repair on her roof.

October 19th, and the committee takes it up.

The city manager briefs the Quality of Life, Arts and Culture Committee on the camera program. Code Compliance says the notices require nothing of the property owners. The city says no citation issues until a code officer has been to the property in person.
