The brush truck carries a camera

Dallas put AI cameras from City Detect on its sanitation brush and bulk trash trucks. They face sideways and capture images from the public right of way. The camera and truck are drawn to illustrate.

It flags a concern, not a violation

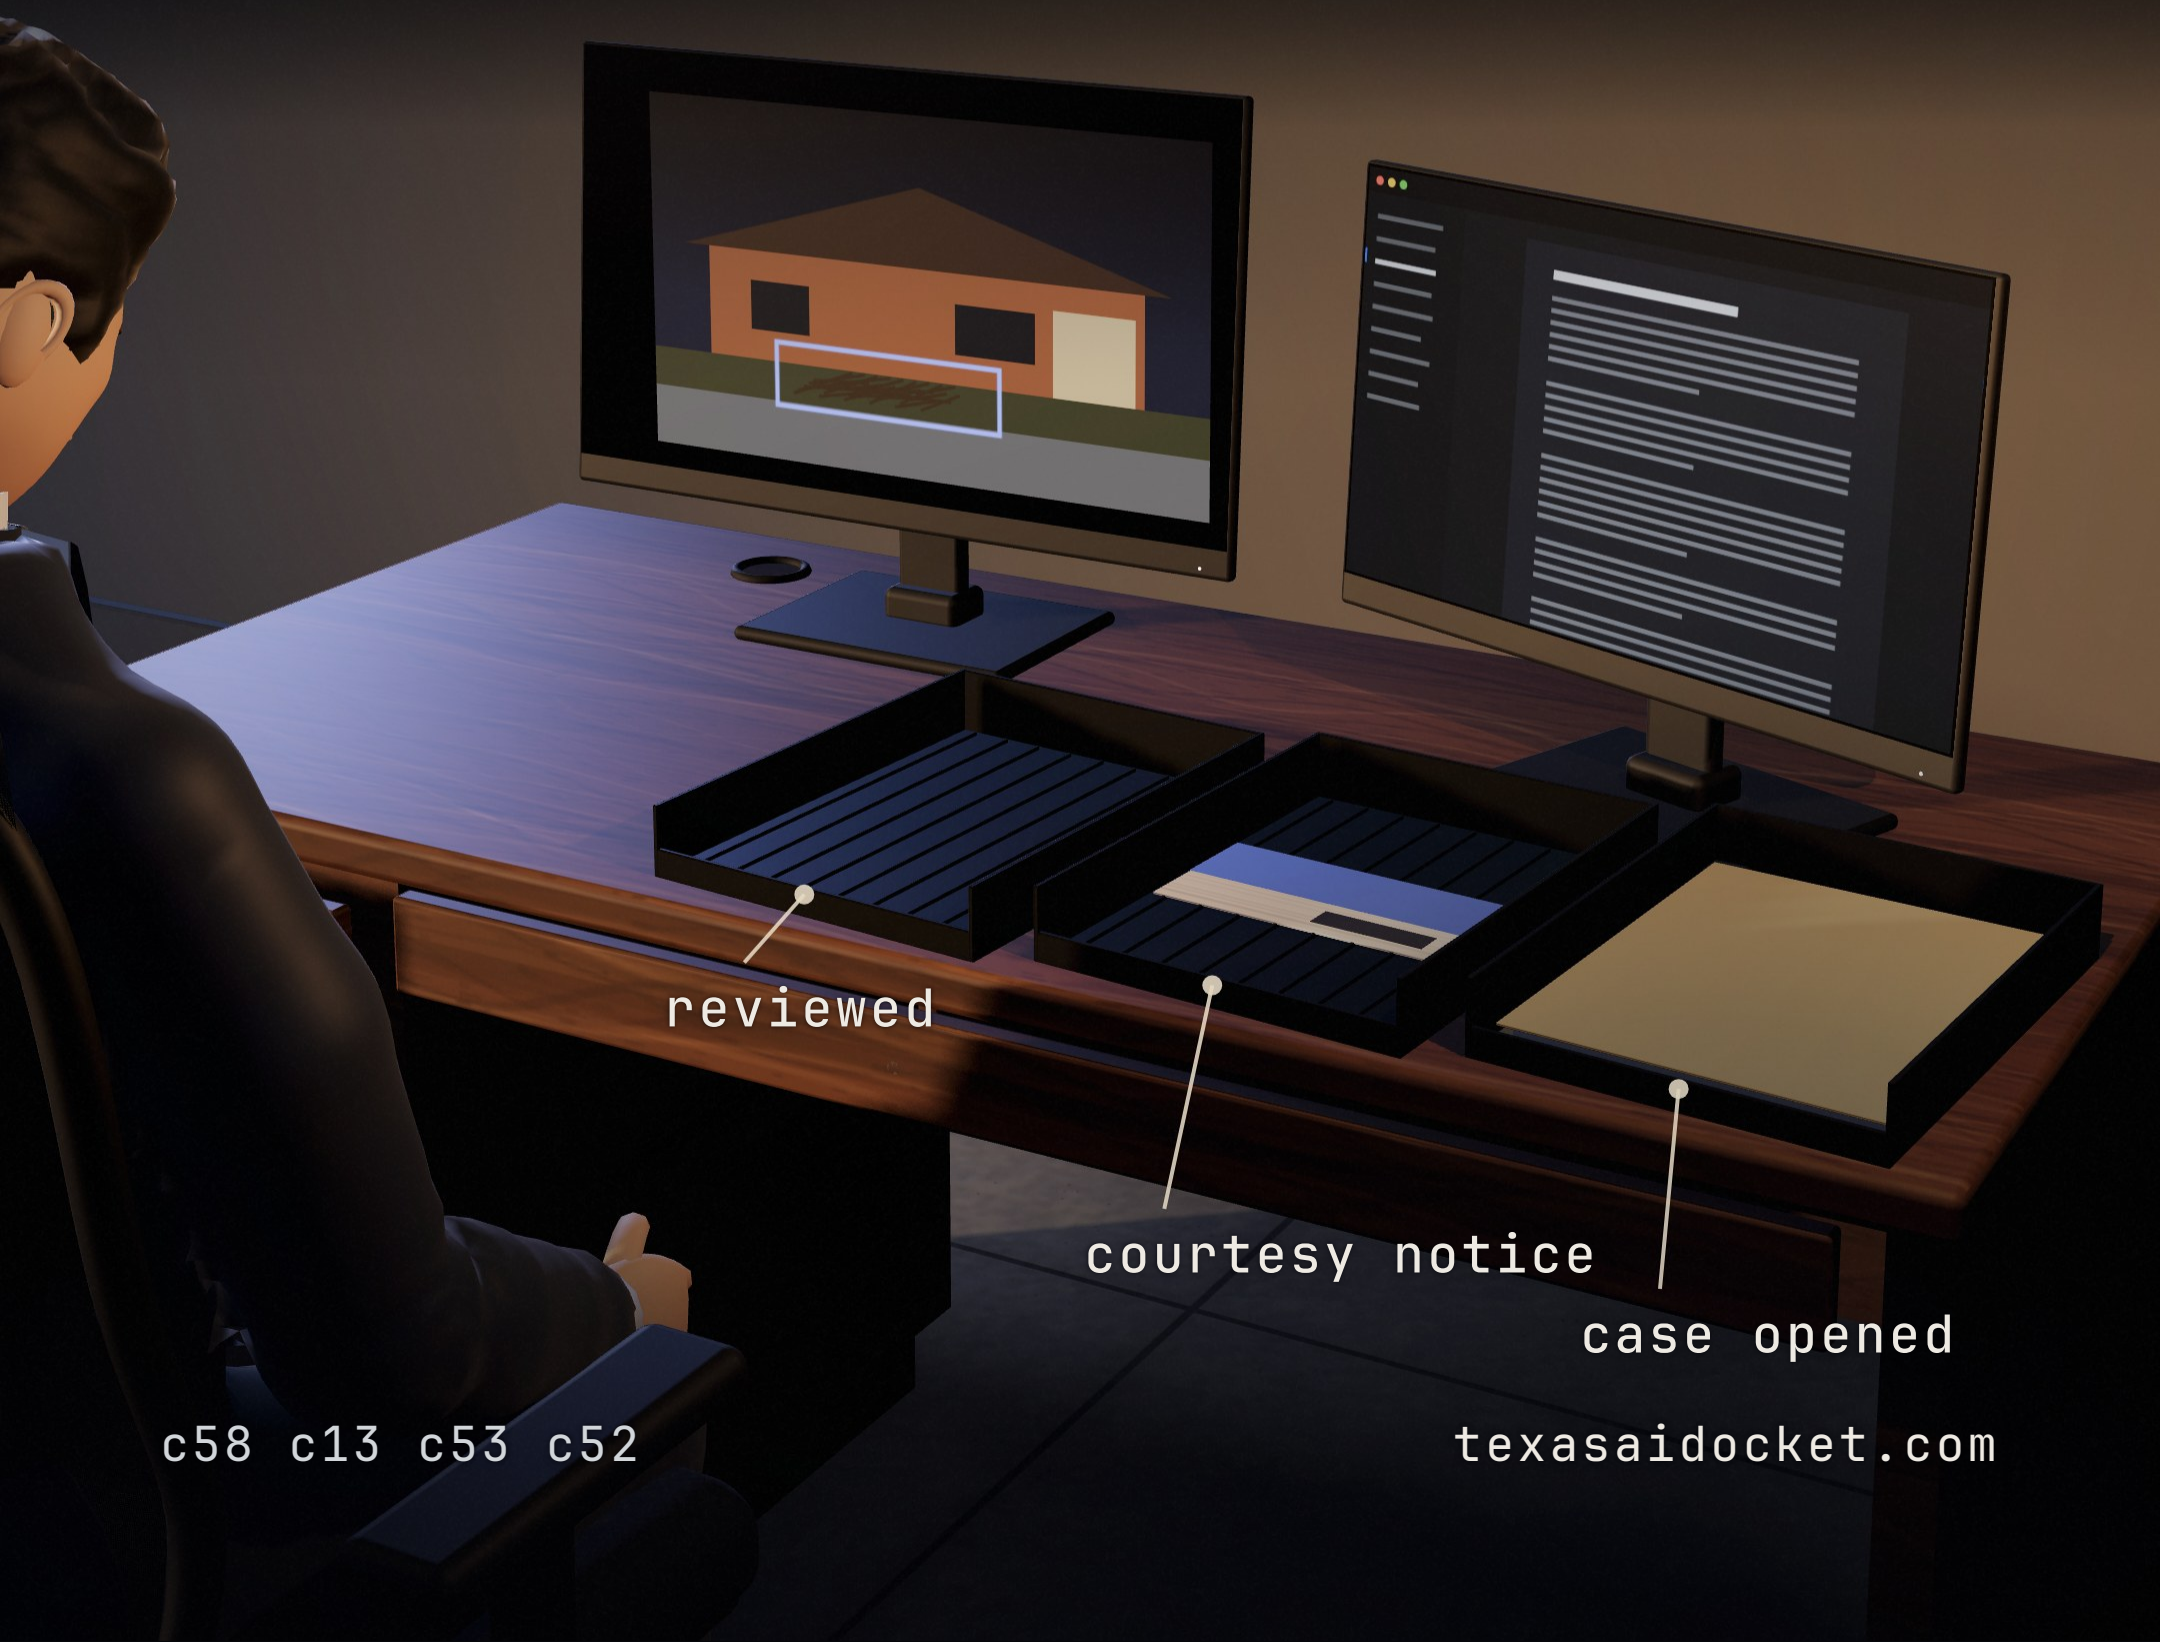

Software marks possible conditions from the city's list. A blight score helps staff decide which properties to review first. Faces and license plates are blurred.

A person reviews the flag

Human review is required before enforcement, the city maintains. Its own briefing says a human stays in the loop.

Some get a courtesy notice

About 3,700 property owners got one after the cameras flagged a possible violation, the city says.

An officer inspects in person

The memo says a citation comes only after a code officer inspects the property and notifies the owner, and counts 57 citations at 34 properties.

10,000 properties scanned

One card here for each property, the memo's count as FOX 4 reported it. The 57 citations are the sheaf in his hand.

Most citations were in southern Dallas

39 of the 57 were in Council Districts 4, 8 and 7, the city manager's memo says. One card here for each citation.

The council funds it a year at a time

The city's December briefing set the terms. A three-year contract subject to annual City Council appropriations, $852,000 a year, and an exit on 10 days' written notice. Chad West withdrew a move to cut the funding once the city manager's office agreed to brief the council.

A notice asks for no action yet

City officials say a courtesy notice is not a citation and requires no action. The notice warns that continued violations could bring a citation or other enforcement.
