

Rent, recommended overnight

The Justice Department has proposed a judgment against Pinnacle, an apartment manager it places in Frisco. The complaint says Pinnacle's RealPage software recommends a new price for every floor plan every night.

Yes in bulk, no with a reason

The complaint says a manager can accept recommendations in bulk. Declining one takes "specific business commentary." It says nearly 60% of final floor plan prices landed within 2.5% of the recommendation and more than 85% within 5%.

3% a day, 8% a week

The complaint says AIRM and YieldStar can accept recommendations automatically, and the default limits are 3% a day and 8% a week. It says a landlord who turns auto-accept on in effect hands pricing authority to RealPage inside those limits.

Leases feed the model

The complaint says landlords' nonpublic lease data runs through a machine learning model whose learned parameters serve every AIRM client. It says the model is generally retrained three to four times a year. It says RealPage has data from over 16 million units.

48 Texas submarkets

The complaint lists them as places where it says aligned pricing harmed or is likely to harm renters. Frisco and Richardson are on the list. RealPage has its headquarters in Richardson.

Nine terms for Pinnacle

The impact statement sums up the proposed judgment against Pinnacle in nine terms. Beside the data limits they require a compliance officer, an annual audit and inspections.

The screen stays on

Five of its limits on how Pinnacle may price. It isn't a ban on RealPage, and the government may review the code and pseudocode of Pinnacle's own product.

It binds one landlord

The judgment is proposed and Pinnacle admits nothing. The government's claims against the remaining defendants go on. The complaint says AIRM and YieldStar penetration runs from at least around 26% to 69% in each listed submarket.
